That's it!

You'll get a confirmation email with a link to view your signed documents. Your tax preparer will also automatically get a notification.

*The IRS requires this identity verification process for specific tax forms. You've likely done something similar any time you've accessed secure information, like a credit check or mortgage application. The questions are generated randomly from public records or credit history. Don't worry if you get an error message - it usually just means that your answers did not match public records or you don't have enough credit history or publicly verifiable information. You can ask your tax preparer to send a new request electronically so you can try again, or you may have to sign in person.
